Return Brings Varied Feelings

WASHINGTON, May 14.—The return of John Quincy Adams, the only bald-headed president of the United States, has brought varied feelings to the hearts of many Americans. Some are proud of the man who, in 1825, became the first president to be elected without having served in the military. Others are disappointed that he did not live long enough to see the country through the Civil War. But most of all, they are proud of the man who, in 1825, became the first president to be elected without having served in the military.

Cherry Blossoms

WASHINGTON, May 14.—Congress was in session today, but the cherry blossoms in the White House garden were the main attraction. The blossoms are in full bloom, and the garden is a beautiful sight. The cherry blossoms are a symbol of the new year, and they are a reminder of the beauty of the world.

John J. Boylan, a member of the House of Representatives, was seen today in the White House garden. He was seen walking through the garden, and he was seen talking to the gardener. The gardener was seen working in the garden, and he was seen talking to the gardener. The gardener was seen working in the garden, and he was seen talking to the gardener.

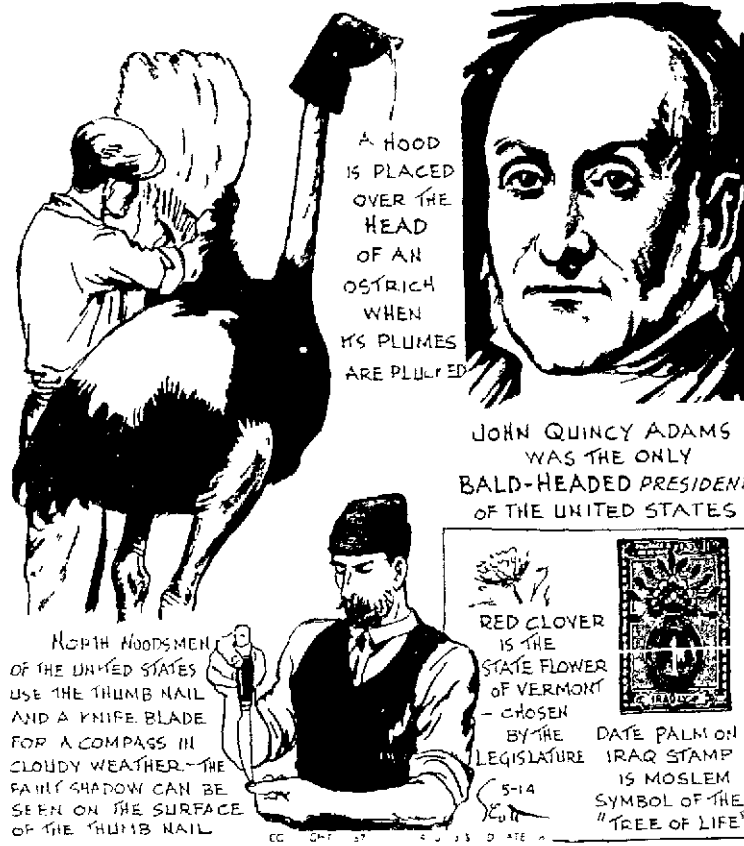

The four-hour day is a topic that has been discussed many times. Some people think it is a good idea, and some people think it is a bad idea. But most people think it is a good idea. The four-hour day is a good idea because it gives people more time to spend with their families and friends. It also gives people more time to spend on their hobbies and interests.

Marriage Meddlers

BY ADELE GARRISON

Bill told Mary what he had in mind. "I'm going to fool around here all day. I've got to get back, I tell you."

"All right," Dicky agreed. "On which side of the cabin are you?"

Bill pointed an eloquent forefinger, and Dicky swung into action. "Come along, Mary. We're in luck," he said. "They're on the other side of the little cove. You can get out of the house here, jump into the boat and I'll row you over to the other cabin where the motor is parked. How did you come up, anyway?"

"By the bus," Mary answered. "I don't know what to do now. Father Veritzen will be home so long before me, and he'll be asking China questions."

"He won't have a chance," Dicky said, exchanging his house slippers for shoes and slipping on a coat. "I'll run you down to your hotel so fast you won't be able to breathe for a week, and when the boys get your father-in-law's coat back on him, he no doubt will come up to see your aunt about the play. Keep him as long as you can, Madge. And you boys stick around, ready for anything your aunt wants done. And remember, stick to it, all of you. Not one of us has seen Mary. You'll have to stultify your consciences, Madge. It's in a good cause."

Mary Gola Away Safely

He was at the door as he spoke. But Mary ran back and threw her arms around him.

She broke away and ran back to her uncle. Dicky threw a direction back at Bill.

"Wait till we're out of sight, Bill," she said. "Then go back to Hank, and then to Mr. Veritzen. Oh, that I could be there to see the fun!"

"It's fun, all right," Bill said, and then he and I went to the railing and watched Dicky and Mary get into the boat and row away around the cove.

"Now, I'll get going," Bill said. "Is his coat badly torn?" I asked worriedly, not because I cared a whit what happened to Philip Veritzen's coat, but because I feared the reaction of his temper upon Mary or her brothers.

"Not enough for anybody to worry about except an old fusser like him," Bill replied. "Hank and I can get it out in a minute, and smooth it over so it can hardly be seen. I'll tell him we couldn't find Mrs. Gibbs, so we fixed it. That will make him feel better, I think. He wouldn't like to have a woman know he was annoyed like that."

"You're very wise, Bill," I told him, and the boy flushed with pleasure.

"Thanks a lot," he said. "It isn't true, but I like it. Well, so long! I'll be seeing you soon, I hope, with Mr. Veritzen in tow. And remember, we haven't seen Mary."

"I'll remember," I said, wondering just how I was going to evade answering Mr. Veritzen's inevitable question. For I dislike intensely the telling of a falsehood, even when, as in the present instance, it seemed a necessary thing to do in order to protect Mary.

But I soon found myself forget-ing Mary and her problems in considering my own. What was Philip Veritzen's real reason for coming to the camp? Was he tracking Mary or did he wish to see me about my play?

Natives of Marion, Ohio, make nothing out of the fact that a little boy, a girl and a cat are all staying in the same house.

An attorney for veritzen has been despatched to the city to see that the cat is properly cared for and that the boy and girl are properly educated.

In Ohio History

(From the 2nd Ohio National Guard, The Associated Press.)

STOOD UNDER HIS ORDERS

When the 4th Ohio National Guard regiment became disorganized under the command of the Cincinnati riots of 1854, Capt. E. Frank Brown stood by his orders. While the others returned to Dayton, Capt. Brown, three members of his company and two others from another reported for duty at the Hamilton county courthouse.

The Dayton squad remained in Cincinnati on guard duty until the rioting ended. Upon their return to Dayton, the members were cheered by persons who said they had recognized Dayton from the stigma brought by the action of the other guard members. The regiment was disbanded because of the conduct of a majority of the members.

A ball to be hung from a motorist's collar has been invented that is rung by a touch of his chin to arouse him should he go to sleep while driving.

POWER PLANS CHANGED

State control of electric power generation in Japan is finding little support among the members of the new cabinet in Tokyo. It now has before it a plan proposed by President Matsunaga of the Tokyo Electric Power Company. He wants that within the next 10 years a power shortage will come unless steps are taken to develop power plants privately owned but subsidized by the government. Matsunaga points out that if war breaks out coal will be used for purposes other than the generation of power. The government, he maintains, must develop liberally the water power resources of the country. He suggests merger of the efficient and profitable companies and the scrapping of the numerous unprofitable small companies.
